Economics, so they say, is eighty percent psychology. In this book, the author shows that psychology is one hundred per cent economics. Every human interaction can be understood as a form of market economy. The theoretical explanation for this model follows from recent developments in systems and evolution theory and the epistemological concepts of so-called "radical constructivism".

Human behaviour can be seen as a commodity that is differentiated, named, evaluated and exchanged, and that means that anyone who acts, transacts. This book elucidates what this means in theory and practice for a manager and his everyday life, the organisation of companies, management, achievement, planning and business culture; the author illustrates this in a number of case studies and complements it with recipes for a manager's everyday life.

"A stimulating walk for the inquisitive and the pragmatist over the fairground of our personal behavioural options ... clearly sets this book apart from other management guides on offer."
